IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE.

"Do not overwater seedlings in hot-beds and cold frames if you would avoid the disease known as 'damping off' is the advice of Professor G. H. Coons, plant pathologist at M. A. C. The disease is indicated by the wilting and toppling over of the young plants and may cause serious damage if steps are not taken to prevent loss. Tomato and cucumber seedlings and cabbage plants are especially susceptible to the disease.

When the disease starts in a frame it will spread rapidly unless checked by proper methods. Watering should be lessened, the ground carefully stirred, and sand sprinkled lightly over the surface. Crusty soils, poor drainage and excess of water favor the disease and should be guarded against.

If the soil around a sick plant is drenched with formaldehyde solution, made with strong formaldehyde used at the rate of one part to fifty part of water, the spread of the disease to healthy plants will be checked, although the plants touched by the solution will be killed. This method is advisable for greenhouse men and gardeners.
